When the Bionic Hip goes wrong – metal on metal hip implant recalled

Between 2003 and 2010 it is estimated that a defective implant (ASR or Corail) was used for thousands of people in the UK for hip replacements. These implants are failing not only in the UK but around the world. The implants are manufactured by DePuy who are a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson more familiar to the marketing of baby products. These are not the only producers but this is the company that has produced the majority of implants regularly used in the UK.

There has been a recall of these devices that were used as long ago as 2005.

The hip is made of metal on metal parts that cannot withstand the constant rubbing and pressure and start to break down and the flakes of metal that chip away are leaving debris that remains in the blood stream and can spread and cause serious damage to muscles and bones. If you have an implant, be aware of the warning signs of an increase in pain and inflammation, a grinding or clunking noise, a feeling that the implants are not working well or moving smoothly.

The most worrying aspect other than the prospect of having to go through another

“From the very beginning of my claim Mr Thomas was very reassuring, informative and helpful and I was confident that he had my best interests at heart” operation to correct the damage is the illness related to metal poisoning. Metal poisoning can result in unexplained headaches, rashes, etc... so not necessarily symptoms directly related to the hip joint.
